Friday, October 16, 2020

PolicyLab launched “Research in Motion,” a new video series that allows viewers to hear directly from our researchers on how their ongoing work can contribute to policy and programs moving forward. Keep reading to learn about the videos in this informative and dynamic series!

PolicyLab researcher Kate Wallis, MD, MPH, outlines the importance of screening and identifying developmental concerns in children early to get them the support they need. She also shares her tips for how we can create more equity in referring children for services. You can also view the video here.

PolicyLab researcher Ariel Williamson, PhD, DBSM answers several questions about the impacts of sleep and shares findings from a new study her team conducted to unpack how sleep problems can impact child well-being, and what we can do to address them. You can also view the video here.
